The article highlights successful ContraPest programs across the country resulting in rat population reductions of 90% and announces the start of a program in the city of Ferndale, MI. The story explains the city is moving forward with a program because "ContraPest has the potential to change the way cities around the world address their own rat situations by limiting the rodents' ability to reproduce."

Parker Eco-Pest Control in Seattle was also quoted in the article stating that after running a study in Seattle's Queen Anne neighborhood they have now seen for themselves. "Not only did we see the population go down by 90% in a matter of months, but we heard anecdotally from businesses adjacent to the test site that they've never been rodent-free until now," Wesley Parker told TIME Magazine. Parker went further to state "birth control plus physically sealing up a structure will soon be the gold standard for eco-friendly rodent control."
